

Complaint

Mr G has complained about a guarantor loan Everyday Lending Limited (trading as “George Banco”.com) provided to him. He says the loan was unaffordable.

Background

George Banco provided Mr G with a guarantor loan for £2,000.00 in July 2019. This loan had an APR of 49.74% and a term of 36 months.

This meant that the total amount to be repaid of £3,508.56, including interest, fees and charges of £1,508.56, was due to be repaid in 36 monthly instalments of just under £100.

One of our investigators reviewed Mr G’s complaint and she thought George Banco shouldn’t have provided Mr G with his loan. So she thought that Mr G’s complaint should be upheld.

George Banco disagreed so the case was passed to an ombudsman for a final decision.

My findings

I’ve considered all the available evidence and arguments to decide what’s fair and reasonable in the circumstances of this complaint.

We’ve explained how we handle complaints about unaffordable and irresponsible lending on our website. And I’ve used this approach to help me decide Mr G’s complaint.

Having carefully considered everything I’ve decided to uphold Mr G’s complaint. I’ll explain why in a little more detail.

George Banco needed to make sure it didn’t lend irresponsibly. In practice, what this means is George Banco needed to carry out proportionate checks to be able to understand whether Mr G could afford to repay any credit it provided. The fact that George Banco may also have been able to seek payments from a guarantor did not alter or dilute this obligation in any way.

Our website sets out what we typically think about when deciding whether a lender’s checks were proportionate. Generally, we think it’s reasonable for a lender’s checks to be less thorough – in terms of how much information it gathers and what it does to verify it – in the early stages of a lending relationship.

But we might think it needed to do more if, for example, a borrower’s income was low or the amount lent was high. And the longer the lending relationship goes on, the greater the risk of it becoming unsustainable and the borrower experiencing financial difficulty. So we’d expect a lender to be able to show that it didn’t continue to lend to a customer irresponsibly.

While the payments for this loan were relatively low and suggest that a lighter touch check might have been proportionate here, I’m mindful that the information George Banco has provided suggested that it carried out a credit check before this loan was provided. The results of which showed that Mr G was already significantly indebted.

Indeed George Banco's own checks also showed that, at best, the payments to this loan would take Mr G right towards the margin of his income. And this was with the use of estimated living costs too. Furthermore, the information George Banco has provided also suggests that Mr G was already using most of the credit available to him as well.

I do accept that the recorded purpose of this loan was debt consolidation. But as there is no indication of which debts Mr G was going to consolidate, it's unclear to me how or what was going to be consolidated and more crucially how this was going to improve Mr G's already precarious financial position going forward.

All of this leaves me persuaded by what Mr G has said about already being in a difficult financial position at the time. And while it's possible Mr G's difficulties reflected his choices rather than financial difficulty, I'd add that my experience of these types of cases suggest this is unlikely, in the absence of any reasonable or plausible arguments from George Banco, I've been persuaded to accept Mr G's version of events.

As this is the case, I do think that Mr G's existing financial position meant that he was unlikely to be able to afford the payments to this guarantor loan, without undue difficulty or borrowing further. And I'm satisfied that reasonable and proportionate checks would more like than not have shown George Banco that it shouldn't have provided this loan to Mr G. As George Banco provided Mr G with this loan, notwithstanding this, I'm satisfied it failed to act fairly and reasonably towards him.

Mr G ended up paying interest, fees and charges on a guarantor loan he shouldn't have been provided with. So I'm satisfied that Mr G lost out because of what George Banco did wrong and that it should put things right.

Fair compensation – what George Banco needs to do to put things right for Mr G

Having thought about everything, George Banco should put things right for Mr G by:

- refunding any amount Mr G actually paid over and above the £2,000.00 he was initially lent;
- adding interest at 8% per year simple on any refunded amounts, if there are any, from the date these amounts were paid by Mr G to the date of settlement†;
- in the event no outstanding balance remains, removing all adverse information it recorded on Mr G's credit file as a result of this loan.

† HM Revenue & Customs requires George Banco to take off tax from this interest. George Banco must give Mr G a certificate showing how much tax it has taken off if he asks for one.

My final decision

For the reasons I've explained, I'm upholding Mr G's complaint. Everyday Lending Limited should put things right in the way I've set out above.

Under the rules of the Financial Ombudsman Service, I'm required to ask Mr G to accept or reject my decision before 6 January 2023.
