

The complaint

Mr K has complained, with the help of a professional representative, about a transfer of his Phoenix Life Limited trading as Standard Life (Phoenix Life) personal pension to a small selfadministered scheme (SSAS) in June 2014. Mr K's SSAS was subsequently used to invest in the purchase of an overseas property with The Resort Group (TRG). The investment now appears to have little value. Mr K says he has lost out financially as a result.

Mr K says Phoenix Life failed in its responsibilities when dealing with the transfer request. He says that it should have done more to warn him of the potential dangers of transferring, and undertaken greater due diligence on the transfer, in line with the guidance he says was required of transferring schemes at the time. Mr K says he wouldn't have transferred, and therefore wouldn't have put his pension savings at risk, if Phoenix Life had acted as it should have done.

What happened

Mr K says he was cold called and offered a pension review by a business called Consumer Money Matters Limited (CMML) – a business that at the time was registered with the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) as an introducer of an authorised firm. He agreed and someone subsequently visited his home – Mr K is unsure which business this person worked for. Mr K, who was 48 at the time, says that they strongly recommended he transfer his Phoenix Life pension and invest in TRG. Mr K says he had no experience of investments and trusted the information he was given. He says he understood that the returns were guaranteed given the investment was in property, so it sounded like a realistic opportunity to achieve a significant increase on his pension savings in a safe way.

In March 2014, Phoenix Life sent CMML information about Mr K's pension in response to its request and apparent authority given by Mr K to allow it to do so.

In April 2014, a company was incorporated with Mr K as director. I'll refer to this company as A Limited.

On 27 May 2014, a SSAS with established and then registered with HMRC on 29 May 2014. A Ltd was recorded as the SSAS's principal employer and Cantwell Grove Limited (CGL) was recorded as the administrator. CGL was not subject to FCA regulation.

On 11 June 2014, CGL wrote to Phoenix Life enclosing documents to allow Mr K's pensions to be transferred to the SSAS.

The letter said that CGL was aware of concerns around 'pension liberation', it supported the efforts of the pension industry, and that its business model, as a pensions administrator, had been vetted by HMRC. It also said CGL supported the 'Scorpion' campaign of The Pension Regulator (TPR) and that the 'Scorpion' information leaflet, which warned about the risks of pension liberation, had been shared with Mr K.

CGL enclosed the completed application for the transfer, copies of the scheme trust deed and rules, the HMRC registration confirmation and a scheme details Q&A document, which gave answers to some general questions, including which investments were under consideration.

The Q&A document said that the investments under consideration were a commercial property investment provided by TRG and a discretionary fund management service. The document said that appropriate advice, about whether the investments were satisfactory for the aims of the scheme, was being taken by the trustees of the SSAS from Central Markets Investment Management Limited (CMIM). The letter said CMIM was registered with and regulated by the FCA.

I note at this point there is no evidence that CMIM did in fact provide any advice to Mr K. The trustee advice was provided by another business, which I'll refer to below.

Also enclosed with the transfer request paperwork was a letter signed by Mr K. This letter said he was aware there had been a rise in cases of pension liberation fraud and he was aware of the issues relating to this. The letter said Mr K wanted to confirm he was requesting a transfer to take advantage of investment opportunities, none of which were connected with pension liberation. And it said he was not looking to access his pension before age 55 – the trust deed of the SSAS would not permit this – and he had not been offered a cash or other incentive to transfer.

Phoenix Life then actioned Mr K's transfer and on 27 June 2014 an amount of just over \pm 14,700 was credited to the SSAS.

I mentioned above that another business provided the trustee advice. That business was Broadwood Assets Ltd (BAL.) In an undated copy of a letter issued to Mr K, this said it was providing him with advice, in his capacity as trustee of the SSAS, on the potential suitability of the TRG investment "both as a specific example of an overseas commercial property investment, and more generally as an investment to be held within a SSAS." It said it had not advised on the establishment of the SSAS, was not providing advice that would be deemed regulated – BAL was not regulated or authorised by the FCA – and it wasn't advising on whether the TRG investment was "suitable for the particular needs and objectives of the members of beneficiaries of the SSAS."

Additional funds were transferred to the SSAS, which I understand were other pensions Mr K held with other providers. Between July and October 2014, investments were made in TRG. In December 2014, an investment in Parmenion Capital Partners LLP was also made.

From account statements provided, it appears that the TRG investment was providing credits to the pension intermittently until March 2018. I don't have any further information after this, but Mr K says he has no access to his capital and the asset it incapable of being sold on the open market.

On 11 February 2020, Mr K complained to Phoenix Life. Briefly, he said it ought to have spotted, and told him about, a number of warning signs in relation to the transfer.

These included but were not limited to: the involvement of unregulated businesses, Mr K having been cold called, CGL not being regulated, the intended investment being non-standard and the SSAS being newly registered with no genuine employment link to the sponsoring employer. Mr K said if Phoenix Life had properly informed him of these warning signs, he wouldn't have transferred.

Phoenix Life didn't uphold the complaint. In summary it said Mr K had a legal right to transfer and that none of the information it had about the transfer at the time gave it cause for concern. It was satisfied it had conducted an appropriate level of due diligence given the requirements of the time.

Mr K then referred his complaint to the Financial Ombudsman Service. I issued my provisional of August 2024 in which I explained why I intended to not uphold Mr K's complaint. Included below are the key extracts from my provisional findings, explaining why.

Extracts from my provisional decision

The relevant rules and guidance

Personal pension providers are regulated by the FCA. Prior to that they were regulated by the FCA's predecessor, the Financial Services Authority (FSA). As such Phoenix Life was subject to the FSA/FCA Handbook, and under that to the Principles for Businesses (PRIN) and to the Conduct of Business Sourcebook (COBS). There have never been any specific FSA/FCA rules governing pension transfer requests, but the following have particular relevance here:

- Principle 2 A firm must conduct its business with due skill, care and diligence;
- Principle 6 A firm must pay due regard to the interests of its customers and treat them fairly;
- Principle 7 A firm must pay due regard to the information needs of its clients, and communicate information to them in a way which is clear, fair and not misleading; and
- COBS 2.1.1R (the client's best interests rule), which states that a firm must act honestly, fairly and professionally in accordance with the best interests of its client.

The Pensions Schemes Act 1993 gives a member of a personal pension scheme the right to transfer the cash equivalent value of their accrued benefits to another personal or occupational pension scheme if certain conditions are satisfied (and indeed they may also have a right to transfer under the terms of the contract). This right came to be exploited, with people encouraged to transfer to fraudulent schemes in the expectation of receiving payments from their pension that they weren't entitled to – for instance, because they were below minimum retirement age. At various points, regulators issued bulletins warning of the dangers of taking such action. But it was only from 14 February 2013 that transferring schemes had guidance to follow that was aimed at tackling pension liberation – the "Scorpion" guidance.

The Scorpion guidance was launched by The Pensions Regulator (TPR). It was described as a cross-government initiative by Action Fraud, The City of London Police, HMRC, the Pensions Advisory Service (TPAS), TPR, the SFO, and the FSA/FCA, all of which endorsed the guidance, allowing their names and logos to appear in Scorpion materials. The guidance comprised the following:

- An insert to be included in transfer packs (the 'Scorpion insert'). The insert warns readers about the dangers of agreeing to cash in a pension early and identifies a number of warning signs to look out for.
- A longer booklet issued by TPAS which gives more information, including example scenarios, about pension liberation. Guidance provided by TPR on its website at the time said this longer leaflet was intended to be sent to members who had queries about pension liberation fraud.

 An 'action pack' for scheme administrators that highlighted the warning signs present in a number of transfer examples. It suggested transferring schemes should "look out for" various warning signs of liberation. If any of the warning signs applied, the action pack provided a check list that schemes could use to help find out more about the receiving scheme and how the member came to make the transfer request. Where transferring schemes still had concerns, they were encouraged to write to members to warn them of the potential tax consequences of their actions; to consider delaying the transfer; to seek legal advice; and to direct the member to TPAS, TPR or Action Fraud.

TPR issued the guidance under the powers at s.12 of the Pension Act 2004. Thus, for the bodies regulated by TPR, the status of the guidance was that it provided them with information, education and/or assistance, as opposed to creating any new binding rule or legal duty. Correspondingly, the communications about the launch of the guidance were predominantly expressed in terms that made its non-obligatory status clear. So, the tenor of the guidance is essentially a set of prompts and suggestions, not requirements.

The FSA's endorsement of the Scorpion guidance was relatively informal: it didn't take the form of Handbook Guidance, because it was not issued under s.139A of the Financial Services and Markets Act (FSMA), which enabled the FSA to issue guidance provided it underwent a consultation process first. Nor did it constitute "confirmed industry guidance" as can be seen by consulting the list of all such FSA/FCA guidance on its website.

I take from the above that the contents of the Scorpion guidance was essentially informational and advisory in nature and that deviating from it doesn't necessarily mean a firm has broken the Principles or COBS rules. Firms were able to take a proportionate approach to transfer requests, balancing consumer protection with the need to also execute a transfer promptly and in line with a member's legal rights.

That said, the launch of the Scorpion guidance was an important moment in so far it provided, for the first time, guidance for personal pension providers dealing with transfer requests – guidance that prompted providers to take a more active role in assessing those requests. The guidance was launched in response to widespread abuses that were causing pension scheme members to suffer significant losses. And the guidance's specific purpose was to inform and help ceding firms when they dealt with transfer requests in order to prevent these abuses and save their customers from falling victim to them.

In those circumstances, I consider firms which received pension transfer requests needed to pay regard to the contents of the Scorpion guidance as a matter of good industry practice. It means February 2013 marks an inflection point in terms of what was expected of personal pension providers dealing with transfer requests as a matter of fulfilling their duties under the regulator's Principles and COBS 2.1.1R.

What did personal pension providers need to do?

For the reasons given above, I don't think personal pension providers necessarily had to follow all aspects of the Scorpion guidance in every transfer request. However, I do think they should have paid heed to the information it contained. And where the recommendations in the guidance applied, absent a good reason to the contrary, it would normally have been reasonable, and in my view good industry practice, for pension providers at least to follow the substance of those recommendations. With that in mind, I take the view that personal pension providers dealing with transfer requests needed to heed the following:

- 1. As a first step, a ceding scheme needed to check whether the receiving scheme was validly registered.
- 2. When TPR launched the Scorpion guidance in February 2013, its press release said the Scorpion insert should be provided in the information sent to members requesting a transfer. It said on its website that it wanted the inclusion of the Scorpion insert in transfer packs to "become best practice." The Scorpion insert provided an important safeguard for transferring members, allowing them to consider for themselves the liberation threat they were facing. Sending it to customers asking to transfer their pensions was also a simple and inexpensive step for pension firms to take and one that wouldn't have got in the way of efficiently dealing with transfer requests. So, all things considered, I think the Scorpion insert should have been sent as a matter of good industry practice with transfer packs and direct to the transferring member when the request for the transfer pack had come from a different party.
- 3. I also think it would be fair and reasonable for personal pension providers operating with the regulator's Principles and COBS 2.1.1R in mind to ensure the warnings contained in the Scorpion insert were provided in some form to a member before a transfer even if the transfer process didn't involve the sending of transfer packs.
- 4. The Scorpion guidance asked firms to look out for the tell-tale signs of pension liberation scams and undertake further due diligence and take appropriate action where it was apparent their client might be at risk. The action pack points to the warning signs transferring schemes should have been looking out for and provides a framework for any due diligence and follow-up actions. Therefore, whilst using the action pack wasn't an inflexible requirement, it did represent a reasonable benchmark for the level of care expected of transferring schemes and identified specific steps that would be appropriate for them to take, if the circumstances demanded.
- 5. The considerations of regulated firms didn't start and end with the Scorpion guidance. If a personal pension provider had good reason to think the transferring member was being scammed even if the suspected scam didn't involve anything specifically referred to in the Scorpion guidance then its general duties to its customer as an authorised financial services provider would come into play and it would have needed to act. Ignoring clear signs of a scam, if they came to a firm's attention, or should have done so, would almost certainly breach the regulator's principles and COBS 2.1.1R.

The circumstances surrounding the transfer – what does the evidence suggest happened?

Mr K says he agreed to a review of his pension following a cold call and a subsequent faceto-face meeting at his home then took place. He says he understood the person to be a pension adviser, but wasn't clear for whom they worked.

Phoenix Life received a request to release information about Mr K's pension on his authority to CMML. As I said above, CMML was registered with the FCA as an introducer of an authorised firm.

The Q&A document that CGL sent to Phoenix Life referred to CMIM, an FCA regulated adviser, potentially being involved. But the document indicates that its involvement, if there was any, was only to give advice to the trustees of the SSAS about whether the proposed investment was appropriate to its aims, not to advise Mr K as a consumer about the transfer. And it appears that CMIM wasn't ultimately involved in that capacity. The advice to Mr K, in his capacity as trustee, about the investment in the SSAS actually ended up being given by BAL, an unregulated business.

So, taking all of his into account, and in the absence of any evidence to indicate that another business was involved, on balance I think the cold call and subsequent face to face meeting were both likely carried out by CMML.

Mr K says the person he met with strongly recommended he transfer his pension to a SSAS and invest in an overseas commercial property investment – TRG. He says he had no experience of investing and trusted the information he was given, which was that the returns were guaranteed because the investment was in property. He says no risks were discussed and the person he met with gave no indication that they weren't FCA authorised (although it seems likely from what I said above that they were.) He says to him, the investment sounded like a realistic opportunity to increase the returns on his pension savings in a safe way. It was on this basis he says he agreed to go ahead.

Mr K wasn't offered a cash or other incentive to transfer nor was accessing his benefits before age 55 something that was promoted to him. Mr K says he did not receive a copy of the Scorpion leaflet and doesn't recall receiving any other correspondence from Phoenix life whether by post or email.

Mr K's recollections appear to be plausible and in line with other evidence about the transfer that is available. For instance, I haven't seen anything to suggest that he was offered or received a payment or other incentive to transfer or that he's received funds from the pension. I also can't see any evidence of Phoenix Life contacting him during the transfer process. And as a result, I think the reason Mr K transferred appears to have been the prospect of guaranteed higher returns that he was told he'd receive.

Mr K signed a letter as part of the application, saying that he was aware of the risks of pension liberation, had carefully considered the request to transfer and decided he wanted to proceed for the investment opportunities this provided. The letter also said he was aware of the risks of pension liberation and confirmed that he wasn't planning to access his pension before age 55 and asked Phoenix Life to complete the transfer promptly. In my view, this letter appears to have been pre-prepared for Mr K to complete.

But it is only a page long and expresses that Mr K is aware of what pension liberation is and that crucially he wasn't planning to access his pension early.

What did Phoenix Life do and was it enough?

The Scorpion insert:

For the reasons given above, my view is that personal pension providers should, as a matter of course, have sent transferring members the Scorpion insert or given them substantially the same information.

But I can't see any evidence that Phoenix Life sent Mr K the Scorpion insert or the information it contained in another format. Instead, Phoenix Life appears to have relied on what CGL said when it submitted the transfer paperwork, that it had shared the Scorpion leaflet with Mr K. But given it was an unregulated business that stood to gain from the transfer, I don't think it should have generally relied on passing this important information on to Mr K.

Having said that, Mr K signed a letter explaining why he wanted to go ahead with the transfer, part of which declared that he understood the risks of liberation and he was not seeking to release pension funds before age 55. Therefore, in this case, even though Phoenix Life should have sent the Scorpion insert, I don't think that it would have made a material difference if it had. This is because the evidence suggests that Mr K was, more likely than not, already aware of the very risks that the Scorpion insert was intended to warn him of. And as those risks was focussed on the threat posed by liberation – and the consequences of taking cash from a pension before the age of 55 in particular – I don't think it would have dissuaded Mr K from transferring given he was transferring for different reasons.

I'm also mindful that around the same time as Mr K instructed Phoenix Life to transfer his pension to a SSAS, he'd given the same instruction to a different provider he also held a personal pension with. And this provider sent Mr K some warnings about pension liberation together with the Scorpion leaflet on 18 June. So, I am satisfied Mr K did receive the Scorpion warnings before he transferred this pension.

Due diligence:

In light of the Scorpion guidance, I think firms ought to have been on the look-out for the telltale signs of pension liberation and needed to undertake further due diligence and take appropriate action if it was apparent their customer might be at risk of pension liberation. I would just note though that the action pack for businesses published by the TPR at the time of the transfer here gave warning signs and a checklist of things to look out for in the context of "looking out for pension liberation fraud" (the heading under which this information was listed). And the transfer here took place before the guidance was given a broader scope to cover scams more generally.

It isn't clear what, if any, further due diligence Phoenix Life undertook here. But I think that the information Phoenix Life had received from CGL would have reasonably reassured it that Mr K was not at risk of a pension liberation scam. It had documentary evidence that suggested Mr K was aware of pension liberation fraud and was not about to become a victim of it in the form of the letter that he signed. I'm mindful the letter was pre-prepared. But I don't think Phoenix Life would reasonably have considered the nature of the paperwork indicated a scam was in progress. And I see no persuasive reason why it shouldn't have taken Mr K's signed declarations at face value.

So, I think it was fair and reasonable for Phoenix Life to accept the information and consider the threat of pension liberation – which was the focus of the Scorpion guidance at that time – to have been discounted. And I think it was reasonable for Phoenix Life, in the specific circumstances of this transaction, to go ahead and proceed with the transfer.

Responses to my provisional decision

Phoenix Life said it had nothing further to add.

Mr K's representative said he disagreed with my provisional decision. In summary, they said the following:

- My decision was inconsistent with industry knowledge and practice at the time. They referred to and sent a copy of the published findings from another pension provider about a different consumers transfer, which Mr Ks' representative says has relevance to Mr K's transfer and almost identical circumstances to his.
- My findings were inconsistent with TPR's guidance and runs contrary to an almost identical case decided by the Financial Ombudsman Service on another complaint.

- My provisional decision did not take into account that it has been confirmed in other cases that prior to Mr K's transfer, Phoenix Life had contacted HMRC about its concerns with the kinds of transfer requests it was receiving from CGL. So, it is unacceptable that Phoenix Life did not carry out further due diligence before processing the transfer.
- They disagreed with me that the July 2014 Scorpion guidance update broadened the types of situations pension providers were asked to look out for. They said Phoenix Life and other businesses should have been looking out for warning signs of a wide range of scams from when the guidance was first published, not just signs of early release pension liberation scams.
- Phoenix Life should, as a matter of course, have checked Mr K's employment status.
- There were a large number of warning signs of a potential scam that Phoenix Life should've picked up on and investigated further. They said I hadn't commented on these in my provisional decision, but had reached the conclusion that Mr K was not at risk of a liberation scam, which they disagreed with.
- They didn't agree it was reasonable for Phoenix Life to have accepted the letter Mr K signed to say he wasn't liberating his pension because getting customers to sign these pre-printed letters was all part of the 'scam.'

What I've decided – and why

I've considered all the available evidence and arguments to decide what's fair and reasonable in the circumstances of this complaint.

Having done so, I've decided to not uphold this complaint for the same reasons I gave in my provisional decision. I've addressed below, where I've felt it is necessary to do so, some of the points Mr K's representative has made in response to my provisional decision.

Firstly, Mr K's representative has pointed to what they believe was an inconsistent approach between Phoenix Life's handling of Mr K's transfer and how a different business handled another consumers transfer, some of the details of which entered into the public domain following judgements by the Pensions Ombudsman and the High Court. Mr K's representative highlights that the other business unearthed a number of warning signs in that case, which prompted it to block the transfer. Mr K's representative says that the circumstances of the two transfers are almost identical, so they believe Phoenix Life should have done the same here. The argument is that the approach taken by the other business in the other transfer was the correct one and represented industry practice, so it is unreasonable for Phoenix Life or our Service to endorse a different approach.

I've reached my decision based on the specific circumstances of Mr K's individual complaint. In my view no two complaints are exactly the same. So, while on the face of it they might look similar, Mr K's circumstances are different to those in complaints and transfer requests made by other consumers and involving other businesses.

I'd expect a transferring scheme to assess each transfer request on its own individual facts. And while that might result in different outcomes based on what look to be similar circumstances, it doesn't necessary follow that Phoenix Life has acted unfairly or fallen short of what was reasonably expected of it at the time. Given the specific facts and circumstances of Mr K's transfer, I'm satisfied – for the reasons I've already given – that Phoenix Life did not need to undertake the detailed due diligence Mr K's representative has suggested. This is because I think it could reasonably consider the threat of the thing it had been told to lookout for – i.e. pension liberation – was low in Mr K's case.

Mr K's representative has argued that Phoenix Life should have checked Mr K's employment status to ensure he had a right to transfer. The outcome of those checks would, in the view of Mr K's representative, have caused Phoenix Life concerns because of a lack of employment link to the SSAS's sponsoring employer. I've outlined the obligations businesses had in my provisional decision and this didn't include an obligation for ceding schemes to check, as a matter of course, whether the transferring member was earning. And I've seen nothing to indicate Phoenix Life had a reason to think Mr K wasn't earning. So, I don't think it was fair and reasonable for it to have probed further. In any event, Mr K's representative hasn't said he wasn't earning at the time, so this isn't important to the outcome of the complaint.

Mr K's representative says that, prior to Mr K's transfer, Phoenix Life contacted HMRC about its concerns with the kinds of transfer requests it was receiving from CGL. So, they say it is unacceptable that Phoenix Life didn't carry out further due diligence before processing Mr K's transfer. I disagree. HMRC responded to Phoenix Life's concerns saying that it held no information that the schemes concerned were at significant risk of pension liberation. So, with its general concerns seemingly allayed, and given the specific facts and circumstances of Mr Ks' transfer, as I've already said, I think it was reasonable for Phoenix Life to have believed the risk of pension liberation was low. So, so it was not proportionate or reasonable for it to carry out further due diligence in this case.

Mr K's representative doesn't agree it was reasonable for Phoenix Life to have accepted the letter Mr K signed to say he wasn't liberating his pension – they say this was all part of the 'scam' getting him to sign a pre-printed letter and wasn't reflective of Mr K's genuine feelings and understanding of things. But the fact the letter was pre-printed was not in my view a clear and obvious indication that a scam was in progress. Mr K signed the letter, so I think it is reasonable to assume that he would have read what he was signing. I also think it was reasonable for Phoenix Life to have accepted Mr K's signed statement or declaration at face value.

Mr K's representative says that I've interpreted TPR's guidance about what ceding schemes should have been on the lookout for at the time incorrectly – they believe the definition of pension liberation I have applied is too narrow. They don't accept the July 2014 guidance update broadened things to include pension scams more widely – rather they believe Phoenix Life should always have been on the lookout for more than just early access to pensions.

When the Scorpion guidance was initially published in February 2013, the campaign referred to pension liberation fraud. And TPR talked about this being a transfer to a fund that allowed members to gain access to pension funds not by way of a regular payment at retirement, which could be considered an unauthorised payment. That doesn't mean unauthorised payments were just confined to a scenario where someone was offered a loan or cash incentive to transfer before age 55. But these scenarios were the focus of the literature at the time. The messaging changed in 2014.

By way of example, the front page of the 2013 Scorpion insert has the following message: "Companies are singling out savers like you and claiming that they can help you cash in your pension early. If you agree to this you could face a tax bill of more than half your pension savings." So, it singled out early access to a pension, and cash incentives and enticements to do this as the area of concern. Whereas the front page of the 2014 Scorpion insert says: "A lifetime's savings lost in a moment...Pension Scams. Don't get stung."

The 2013 Scorpion insert goes on to say: "Pension loans or cash incentives are being used alongside misleading information to entice savers as the number of pension scams increases. This activity is known as 'pension liberation fraud' and it's on the increase in the UK. In rare cases – such as terminal illness – it is possible to access funds before age 55 from your current pension scheme. But for the majority, promises of early cash will be bogus and are likely to result in serious tax consequences." Again, the emphasis is on the promise of 'early cash' and 'early access' to pension benefits before the pension scheme age and the associated tax consequences that could follow. The 2014 Scorpion insert also warns about taking cash from a pension before the age of 55 but without a mention or emphasis on tax consequences. And it also warns about the dangers of "one-off investment opportunities" and the potential to lose an entire pension pot.

The 2013 Scorpion action pack for businesses was titled 'Pension Liberation Fraud' whereas the 2014 action pack is titled 'Pension Scams'. And the case studies in the 2013 action pack are solely about people wanting to use their pension in order to access cash before age 55, the repercussions of which were tax charges and the loss of some pension monies to high administration fees. The warning signs that were highlighted followed suit: "accessing a pension before age 55", "legal loopholes", "cash bonus", "targeting poor credit histories", "loans to members". Once again therefore the focus, and what TPR was emphasising that pension liberation was, was around enticements promising access to pensions before age 55. In contrast, the 2014 action pack included a case study about someone transferring in order to benefit from a "unique investment opportunity" which subsequently failed causing the consumer to lose his entire pension.

I think this shows that at the time of Mr K's transfer, transferring schemes were being directed to the threat posed by people wanting to take cash from their pensions in an unauthorised manner, which was seen as being most likely when someone was under the age of 55. The potential for people to lose money, and suffer tax charges, from suspect investments was commented upon, but only in so far as it was seen as being part and parcel of someone taking an unauthorised payment from their pension, rather than being something to look for in isolation. That particular concern came more into focus later on.

So, I'm satisfied that it was reasonable for Phoenix Life to have relied on the emphasis and focus of the February 2013 guidance, which was applicable at the time of Mr K's transfer, when considering his request and deciding whether further due diligence was required. I think it is important to stress here that, Phoenix Life had to take a proportionate approach and balance any caution and due diligence with the fact that consumers, like Mr K, were entitled to request a transfer. I don't think, for example that delaying all transfer requests in order to carry out extensive due diligence in every case can reasonably be said to be proportionate.

I think it was fair that Phoenix Life considered Mr K's request and made a judgement call based on the information available to it at the time. And as I've explained, I think it was reasonable, based on the information given to it, for Phoenix Life to have considered that the risk of pension liberation in Mr K's case was low.

For the avoidance of doubt, I'm not saying here that the risk did not exist or that there weren't other warning signs that Phoenix Life could've become aware of had it asked further questions. But for the reasons I've already given, I think in the particular circumstances of this case, including having had sight of the letter Mr K signed, it was, it was fair and reasonable for Phoenix Life, in the context of taking a proportionate response, to decide here that it didn't have good reason to delay Mr K's transfer and ask additional questions.

Summary

I understand that Mr K has lost out financially by investing in high-risk investments, which were likely unsuitable for him. But the guidance TPR put in place at the time of Mr K's transfer request, was focussed on the risk of consumers falling victim to a pension liberation scam. And for the reasons I've explained above, I think there was enough information for Phoenix Life to reasonably discount the risk of that in this case. So, while I know this will come as a disappointment to Mr K, I don't think it would be fair or reasonable in these circumstances to suggest that Phoenix Life ought to have delayed the transfer process to conduct further checks simply to further safeguard against something it had already reasonably discounted.

My final decision

For the reasons above, I've decided to not uphold this complaint.

Under the rules of the Financial Ombudsman Service, I'm required to ask Mr K to accept or reject my decision before 26 September 2024. Paul Featherstone Ombudsman
