

The complaint

Mr E has complained about a transfer of his Aviva Life & Pensions UK Limited ('Aviva') pension to a Qualifying Recognised Overseas Pension Scheme ('QROPS') in Malta in November 2014. Mr E's QROPS was subsequently used to invest in Dolphin Capital (which later became the German Property Group). The investment now appears to have little value. Mr E says he has lost out financially as a result.

Mr E says Aviva failed in its responsibilities when dealing with the transfer request. He says that it should have done more to warn him of the potential dangers of transferring, and undertaken greater due diligence on the transfer, in line with the guidance he says was required of transferring schemes at the time. Mr E says he wouldn't have transferred, and therefore wouldn't have put his pension savings at risk, if Aviva had acted as it should have done.

For the sake of clarity, Mr E's pension plan was with Friends Life. Friends Life have since become part of Aviva and it is Aviva that is the respondent for Mr E's complaint. So, for ease of reading I will refer to any actions or responses as being Aviva's.

What happened

In early 2014, Mr E says he received a number of cold calls from businesses offering him a free pension review. And it was following one of these calls that he says a review of his pension took place. The available evidence indicates Mr E signed letters of authority to allow two firms to access his pension details:

- Global Partners Limited (GPL) – GPL was a financial adviser regulated in a European Economic Area (EEA) member state. The firm became Tourbillon Limited after June 2014 who were again an EEA regulated financial adviser and entered on the Financial Conduct Authority (FCA) register as having passporting rights to provide services within the UK.
- AWM Financial Services – a trading name of a FCA regulated firm.

While Aviva received requests for information about Mr E's pension from both these firms in February 2014, Mr E says it was a business called Portia Financial with whom he agreed to meet at his home to discuss his pension. There is no exact match on the FCA register for this business, so it appears it was not regulated at the time.

Mr E says during the meeting he was advised to transfer his pension to a QROPS and invest in Dolphin, to take advantage of a high yielding investment retuning over 10% a year. Mr E says he was then referred to Servatus¹ who re-iterated the advice to transfer to the Harbour Pensions Limited QROPS and invest 65% of his pension funds in Dolphin with the balance invested in two investment funds with SEB².

¹ Servatus was a financial adviser authorised in another EEA member state – it additionally held passporting rights to provide services within the UK.

Mr E applied to start a QROPS with Harbour Pensions. The membership form dated 17 June 2014 names Servatus as the professional adviser.

Servatus provided Mr E with a recommendation report dated 22 July 2014, which set out the advice in writing. Mr E says that because he believed the people he was dealing with were trustworthy, he agreed to go ahead.

On 22 August 2014, Aviva received Mr E's transfer papers from Harbour Pensions. Because Aviva previously provided an incorrect overseas transfer form, on 4 September 2014 it asked Harbour Pensions to complete some revised paperwork, which they returned on 15 October 2014. Harbour Pensions referred to having previously provided a completed HMRC form APSS263 and a HMRC QROPS letter.

On 4 November 2014, Aviva transferred Mr E's pension – an amount of around £67,400. Mr E was approaching his 60th birthday at the time. Mr E took his 25% tax-free cash lump sum and with the remaining funds, 65% was used to invest in Dolphin and the remainder was placed in two investment funds.

The investment in Dolphin Capital was a loan note to the company. The loan was to be repaid with pre agreed interest from the profits made by the property company. Dolphin Capital later changed its name to the German Property Group (GPG). GPG went into administration having allegedly failed to use investors' money to develop properties. There is no secondary market for these loan notes and, where they have failed to realise the intended returns investors are unlikely to get their investments back.

In November 2021, Mr E complained to Aviva. Briefly his argument is that Aviva ought to have carried out due diligence, spotted and told him about a number of warning signs or risks in relation to the transfer including being contacted by an unregulated business regarding a high-risk investment.

Aviva didn't uphold the complaint. In summary it said it had carried out appropriate due diligence at the time to satisfy that the transfer could go ahead.

Our investigator was unable to resolve the dispute informally, so the matter was passed to me to decide. Mr E's representative raised a number of points in response to the investigator's assessment that the complaint shouldn't be upheld, which I will refer to and address below where I think it is necessary and appropriate to do so.

What I've decided – and why

I've considered all the available evidence and arguments to decide what's fair and reasonable in the circumstances of this complaint.

² SEB is the trading name of SEB Life International Assurance Company Limited, part of the SEB Group, regulated by the Central Bank of Ireland. It is a life assurance company incorporated and regulated in Ireland, engaging in the cross-border distribution of insurance-based investment products.

I've taken into account relevant law and regulations, regulatory rules, guidance and standards, codes of practice, and (where appropriate) what I consider to have been good industry practice at the relevant time. Where the evidence is incomplete or inconclusive, I've reached my decision based on the balance of probabilities – in other words, on what I think is more likely than not to have happened, given the available evidence and wider circumstances.

The relevant rules and guidance

Personal pension providers are regulated by the FCA. Prior to that they were regulated by the FCA's predecessor, the Financial Services Authority (FSA). As such Aviva was subject to the FSA/FCA Handbook, and under that to the Principles for Businesses (PRIN) and to the Conduct of Business Sourcebook (COBS). There have never been any specific FSA/FCA rules governing pension transfer requests, but the following have particular relevance here:

- Principle 2 – A firm must conduct its business with due skill, care and diligence;
- Principle 6 – A firm must pay due regard to the interests of its customers and treat them fairly;
- Principle 7 – A firm must pay due regard to the information needs of its clients, and communicate information to them in a way which is clear, fair and not misleading; and
- COBS 2.1.1R (the client's best interests rule), which states that a firm must act honestly, fairly and professionally in accordance with the best interests of its client.

An overseas pension scheme is defined in HMRC regulations as being one which is subject to specified regulatory and taxation restrictions in the country of establishment. To become a QROPS it must also be:

- Recognised, meaning in short that it meets specified tests applied by HMRC, including on minimum retirement age and the application of tax relief.
- Qualifying, meaning it must notify HMRC that it is a recognised overseas pension scheme; provide appropriate evidence of this; undertake to adhere to HMRC's requirements; and not be otherwise excluded by HMRC from being a QROPS.

Overseas schemes that have notified HMRC that they qualify to be a QROPS are included in a published list on HMRC's website.

The Pensions Schemes Act 1993 gives a member of a personal pension scheme the right to transfer the cash equivalent value of their accrued benefits to another personal or occupational pension scheme, which is either registered with HMRC for tax purposes or is a QROPS. And indeed they may also have a right to transfer under the terms of the contract.

This right came to be exploited, with people encouraged to transfer to fraudulent schemes in the expectation of receiving payments from their pension that they weren't entitled to – for instance, because they were below minimum retirement age. At various points, regulators issued bulletins warning of the dangers of taking such action. But it was only from 14 February 2013 that transferring schemes had guidance to follow that was aimed at tackling pension liberation – the "Scorpion" guidance.

The Scorpion guidance was launched by The Pensions Regulator (TPR). It was described as a cross-government initiative by Action Fraud, The City of London Police, HMRC, the Pensions Advisory Service (TPAS), TPR, the SFO, and the FSA/FCA, all of which endorsed the guidance, allowing their names and logos to appear in Scorpion materials.

As I've said above, the Scorpion campaign was launched in February 2013 and the guidance was updated regularly over the next few years. Both the guidance published in 2013 and the 24 July 2014 update are relevant in this case – this widened the focus from pension liberation specifically, to pension scams, which it said were on the increase. Transfers of money or investments overseas, were also highlighted as something to watch out for and it explained this was because the money would be harder to recover.

The guidance comprised the following:

- An insert to be included in transfer packs (the 'Scorpion insert'). The insert warns readers about the dangers of agreeing to cash in a pension early and identifies a number of warning signs to look out for.
- A longer booklet issued by TPAS which gives more information, including example scenarios, about pension liberation. Guidance provided by TPR on its website at the time said this longer leaflet was intended to be sent to members who had queries about pension liberation fraud.
- An 'action pack' for scheme administrators that highlighted the warning signs present in a number of transfer examples. It suggested transferring schemes should "look out for" various warning signs of liberation. If any of the warning signs applied, the action pack provided a check list that schemes could use to help find out more about the receiving scheme and how the member came to make the transfer request. Where transferring schemes still had concerns, they were encouraged to write to members to warn them of the potential tax consequences of their actions; to consider delaying the transfer; to seek legal advice; and to direct the member to TPAS, TPR or Action Fraud.

TPR issued the guidance under the powers at s.12 of the Pension Act 2004. Thus, for the bodies regulated by TPR, the status of the guidance was that it provided them with information, education and/or assistance, as opposed to creating any new binding rule or legal duty. Correspondingly, the communications about the launch of the guidance were predominantly expressed in terms that made its non-obligatory status clear. So, the tenor of the guidance is essentially a set of prompts and suggestions, not requirements.

The FSA's endorsement of the Scorpion guidance was relatively informal: it didn't take the form of Handbook Guidance, because it was not issued under s.139A of the Financial Services and Markets Act (FSMA), which enabled the FSA to issue guidance provided it underwent a consultation process first. Nor did it constitute "confirmed industry guidance", as can be seen by consulting the list of all such FSA/FCA guidance on its website.

I take from the above that the contents of the Scorpion guidance was essentially informational and advisory in nature and that deviating from it doesn't necessarily mean a firm has broken the Principles or COBS rules. Firms were able to take a proportionate approach to transfer requests, balancing consumer protection with the need to also execute a transfer promptly and in line with a member's legal rights.

That said, the launch of the Scorpion guidance was an important moment in so far it provided, for the first time, guidance for personal pension providers dealing with transfer requests – guidance that prompted providers to take a more active role in assessing those requests.

The guidance was launched in response to widespread abuses that were causing pension scheme members to suffer significant losses. And the guidance's specific purpose was to inform and help ceding firms when they dealt with transfer requests in order to prevent these abuses and save their customers from falling victim to them.

In those circumstances, I consider firms which received pension transfer requests needed to pay regard to the contents of the Scorpion guidance as a matter of good industry practice.

It means February 2013 marks an inflection point in terms of what was expected of personal pension providers dealing with transfer requests as a matter of fulfilling their duties under the regulator's Principles and COBS 2.1.1R.

What did personal pension providers need to do?

For the reasons given above, I don't think personal pension providers necessarily had to follow all aspects of the Scorpion guidance in every transfer request. However, I do think they should have paid heed to the information it contained. And where the recommendations in the guidance applied, absent a good reason to the contrary, it would normally have been reasonable, and in my view good industry practice, for pension providers at least to follow the substance of those recommendations. With that in mind, I take the view that personal pension providers dealing with transfer requests needed to heed the following:

1. When TPR launched the Scorpion guidance in February 2013, its press release said the Scorpion insert should be provided in the information sent to members requesting a transfer. It said on its website that it wanted the inclusion of the Scorpion insert in transfer packs to "become best practice". The Scorpion insert provided an important safeguard for transferring members, allowing them to consider for themselves the liberation threat they were facing. Sending it to customers asking to transfer their pensions was also a simple and inexpensive step for pension firms to take and one that wouldn't have got in the way of efficiently dealing with transfer requests. So, all things considered, I think the Scorpion insert should have been sent as a matter of good industry practice with transfer packs and direct to the transferring member when the request for the transfer pack had come from a different party.
2. I also think it would be fair and reasonable for personal pension providers – operating with the regulator's Principles and COBS 2.1.1R in mind – to ensure the warnings contained in the Scorpion insert were provided in some form to a member before a transfer even if the transfer process didn't involve the sending of transfer packs.
3. The Scorpion guidance asked firms to look out for the tell-tale signs of pension liberation scams and undertake further due diligence and take appropriate action where it was apparent their client might be at risk. The action pack points to the warning signs transferring schemes should have been looking out for and provides a framework for any due diligence and follow-up actions. Therefore, whilst using the action pack wasn't an inflexible requirement, it did represent a reasonable benchmark for the level of care expected of transferring schemes and identified specific steps that would be appropriate for them to take, if the circumstances demanded.
4. These were additional requirements over and above what a ceding scheme would always have needed to when processing a QROPS transfer. Those requirements included checking whether the QROPS was on HMRC's published list, and ensuring the necessary HMRC forms were completed.
5. The considerations of regulated firms didn't start and end with the Scorpion guidance. If a personal pension provider had good reason to think the transferring member was being scammed – even if the suspected scam didn't involve anything specifically referred to in the Scorpion guidance – then its general duties to its customer as an authorised financial services provider would come into play and it would have needed to act. Ignoring clear signs of a scam, if they came to a firm's attention, or should have done so, would almost certainly breach the regulator's principles and COBS 2.1.1R.

The circumstances surrounding the transfer – what does the evidence suggest happened?

Mr E says that during the early part of 2014, he received a number of cold calls from businesses offering him a free pension review. In response to one of those calls, Mr E says he agreed to a meeting which took place at his home. He says the business he met with was Portia Financial. He says they recommended he transfer his pension to a QROPS and take advantage of an overseas investment opportunity, following which his details were passed to Servatus who re-iterated the advice to transfer.

Mr E hasn't said when his meeting with Portia took place. But I've seen a copy of a letter from Servatus, addressed to Mr E, dated 22 July 2014, which starts by thanking him for meeting with Portia. It then goes on to provide him with what it described as a Financial Planning Report. This set out a recommendation that he transfer his existing personal pension to the Harbour Pensions QROPS in order to invest in the way that he went on to do.

So, while it looks like there were a number of businesses or firms involved here and there was a meeting with a business called Portia Financial, I can see from the evidence that it was Servatus that advised Mr E. And that's what's key here for the reasons I will come on to below.

What did Aviva do and was it enough?

The Scorpion insert:

For the reasons given above, my view is that personal pension providers should, as a matter of course, have sent transferring members the Scorpion insert or given them substantially the same information.

Aviva says that it would've sent a copy of the relevant Scorpion insert in response to a transfer pack and it has provided, what it says, is supporting evidence of this in the form of a process type document. But this document is undated, so I don't consider it persuasive evidence that this was the process in place at the time in question. That said, I don't think this matters because there is no evidence that Aviva corresponded directly with Mr E in the run up to this transfer. In response to the two transfer packs requests I referred to earlier on, Aviva responded to both in writing directly to the businesses concerned. These letters don't refer to the inclusion of the Scorpion insert or otherwise provide the same information. But, even if they did, sending scam warning information that was intended for its customer to a third party wasn't good enough to ensure that Mr E would receive it.

Had Aviva also contacted Mr E in response to the requests for the transfer packs, as I think it should have, then it would have sent him the Scorpion insert that was in use at the time – the version published in February 2013. And this was focused on accessing pension benefits before the age of 55 – pension liberation. But Mr E wasn't planning to do this – he was over the age of 55. So, I don't think the information contained here would've had much impact on Mr E on its own in any event – these things wouldn't have resonated with him.

So, even though I think Aviva should have sent the Scorpion insert to Mr E, I don't think that it would have made any difference to what he went on to do. It simply wasn't warning about the type of harm that he went on to suffer. And the content would not, reasonably, have caused him to be concerned about the advice he'd received.

I can see the Investigator said that Aviva should also have sent Mr E the updated 2014 version of the Scorpion insert upon receipt of the transfer request. But I disagree – while Aviva should have taken the updated 2014 guidance into account when processing the transfer request, there was no need for a provider to send the updated Scorpion insert if the transfer process encompassed the date the insert was updated.

But even if Aviva had gone further and sent Mr E the 2014 insert later in the process (which for the avoidance of doubt I don't think it reasonably needed to do) I don't think this would have changed his mind about proceeding with the transfer. The insert warned again about cold calls and offers of a pension review to lure customers into one-off investment opportunities, which Mr E might have recognised as warning signs in his transfer. The insert referred to more information being available about pension scams on TPR's website. But as the investigator correctly said, the information on the website at that time relevant for customers still warned of accessing pension benefits early or being promised more tax-free cash – neither of which applied to Mr E. And the recommendation was to seek advice from a regulated adviser. So, I think Mr E, just like Aviva (as I will go on to discuss below) would have taken comfort from the fact that a regulated adviser had advised him.

Due diligence:

In light of the Scorpion guidance, I think firms ought to have been on the look-out for the tell-tale signs of a pension scam and needed to undertake further due diligence and take appropriate action if it was apparent their customer might be at risk.

Aviva says that it carried out a number of checks before carrying out the transfer. Based on what it said in its final response letter, this appears to have been limited to checking pension liberation lists and obtaining HMRC and QROPS documentation. But Aviva knew that Mr E wanted to transfer his pension into an overseas pension scheme – a QROPS based in Malta – and that this very likely involved overseas investments.

The 2014 Scorpion Action Pack, which is relevant here gave more prominence to overseas investments. And the potential for a QROPS to facilitate investments, which were at risk of a scam in the wider sense (the guidance shifted the focus away from just pension liberation to pension scams more broadly) was greater.

Overall, I think that in exercising reasonable due diligence in line with its obligations under PRIN and COBS, Aviva should've followed up on the warning sign apparent to it at this time – namely that Mr E was planning to transfer his pension overseas, which was a common theme of pension scams – to understand more about the transfer. And the most reasonable way of going about that would have been to turn to the check list in the action pack to structure its due diligence into the transfer.

The check list provided a series of questions to help transferring schemes assess the potential threat by finding out more about the receiving scheme and how the consumer came to make the transfer request. Some items on the check list could have been addressed by checking online resources such as Companies House and HMRC. Others would have required contacting the consumer. The check list is divided into three parts (which I've numbered for ease of reading and not because I think the check list was designed to be followed in a particular order):

1. The nature/status of the receiving scheme

Sample questions: Is the receiving scheme newly recognised by HMRC, or is the receiving scheme connected to an unregulated investment company?

2. Description/promotion of the scheme

Sample questions: Do descriptions, promotional materials or adverts of the receiving scheme include the words 'loan', 'savings advance', 'cash incentive', 'bonus', 'loophole' or 'preference shares' or allude to overseas investments or unusual, creative or new investment techniques?

3. The scheme member

Sample questions: Has the transferring member been advised by an 'introducer', been advised by a non-regulated adviser or taken no advice? Has the member decided to transfer after receiving cold calls, unsolicited emails or text messages about their pension? Have they applied pressure to transfer as quickly as possible or been told they can access their pension before age 55?

Opposite each question, or group of questions, the check list identified actions that should help the transferring scheme establish the facts. I don't think it would always have been necessary to follow the check list in its entirety. And I don't think an answer to any one single question on the check list would usually be conclusive in itself. A transferring scheme would therefore typically need to conduct investigations across several parts of the check list to establish whether a scam was a realistic threat. Given the warning sign that should have been apparent when dealing with Mr E's transfer request, and the relatively limited information it had about the transfer, I think in this case Aviva should have addressed all three parts of the check list and contacted Mr E as part of its due diligence.

What would Aviva reasonably have discovered?

From a few simple questions, Aviva would have discovered a number of facts about the transfer from Mr E. Under the first section of the checklist, it would've likely found that the prompt for Mr E to transfer his pension to the QROPS was a cold call.

I also think it's likely Aviva would have learned from Mr E that he'd been told by one of the parties he was in contact with about the high annual returns he could expect from an overseas property investment.

In addition to this, under the third section of the checklist, I think Aviva would've discovered that Mr E had spoken to, or dealt with, two firms about this transfer and he would've said that he had been advised to transfer his pension.

So, it would've been reasonable for Aviva to have asked Mr E who gave the advice. In these circumstances and based on what Mr E told us, I think he would've named both Portia Financial and Servatus as being involved in the process. Mr E had obviously dealt with both firms – he says he met with Portia Financial and then received a suitability report from Servatus. So, it's not unreasonable that he would've thought both were connected to the advice he'd received.

The Scorpion checklist recommends that, in order to establish whether a member has been advised by a non-regulated adviser, the transferring scheme should consult the FCA's online register of authorised firms. Aviva should have taken that step, which is not difficult.

Had it done so it would have discovered that Servatus appeared on the FCA register as a firm that was passported from Ireland to the United Kingdom. This means that for UK purposes throughout the period of this transfer Servatus was an authorised person under s.31(1)(b) of the Financial Services and Markets Act (FSMA) 2000 and Schedule 3 to that Act.

With this information I think Aviva could've reasonably assumed that the advice would've come from only one of the firms and that was most likely Servatus. Portia Financial had referred to Servatus for regulated advice and Servatus was the firm who then issued a suitability report. It wouldn't seem unusual for an unregulated party to introduce consumers to a regulated party for advice.

So, I think it is reasonable to assume that, if Aviva had made these inquiries, the presence of Servatus, as an authorised person advising Mr E, would've suggested that the transfer was unlikely to be a scam and that Mr E would enjoy some regulatory protections in the unlikely event it turned out to be one.

I accept the regulatory protections would not come via UK's complaints and investor protection institutions, the FOS or the FSCS. But instead through its own regulator, The Republic of Ireland which also has a complaints system, financial services and pensions ombudsman and a statutory investor compensation scheme, which EU countries are required to have under the EU's Investor Compensation Directive. Furthermore, As a firm that was regulated (albeit by a home-state regulator in another EU jurisdiction) the regulatory protections included the fact that Servatus would have been held to a high standard, mandated throughout the EU, by its own regulator. And as an authorised firm, Servatus would have had to follow the applicable European regulatory standards and conduct its practice in accordance with those standards.

Its operations would have been under some oversight by its regulator to ensure it was acting in the best interest of its client. So, it would've had to meet certain required standards in all of its dealings and be subject to regulation and to investor recourse under the Irish system.

In light of this, I don't think it's unreasonable that Aviva could (and would if it had checked up on Servatus' regulatory standing) have been reassured that Servatus was regulated to EU standards that were accepted for the purpose of authorisation under United Kingdom law.

What should Aviva have done with this information?

Aviva needed to check for the risk of pension liberation and scams in a way that was proportionate to the warning signs. So, while I accept Aviva would likely have (had it conducted thorough due diligence) found there to be some of the pension scam warning signs indicated in the Scorpion Action Pack – e.g. Mr E had been cold called and he was contemplating investing in overseas investments – I think the knowledge Mr E was being advised by a properly authorised adviser in this case reasonably would've given Aviva comfort the transfer was unlikely to be a scam. And that as his regulated adviser, they were likely acting in his best interests and would've made him aware of the relevant risks and issues. It wasn't Aviva's responsibility to question or scrutinise that advice.

So, even if Aviva had done more thorough due diligence in line with the Scorpion Action Pack as it ought to have done here, the end result of any such due diligence wouldn't have resulted in any warnings being given to Mr E. And I don't think the mere act of contacting him and asking questions about the transfer would have prompted a change of heart. The majority of the responses Mr E would likely have provided would not have given rise to concerns.

It therefore follows that I think Mr E would not have stopped the transfer and would still have gone ahead even if things had happened as they should have.

I can see Mr E's representative has referred to another pension policy he was contemplating transferring to the QROPS around the same time as this one, which after the provider (it was an Aviva policy) raised some questions about it, Mr E ultimately decided not to go ahead. They've said this confirms that he was alert to risk warnings and concerns when they were brought to his attention and directly evidences how he was most likely to have reacted if Aviva had directly sent him Scorpion leaflets in October or November 2014.

But as I've said above, even if Aviva had done more thorough due diligence as it ought to have done in this case, the end result of any such due diligence wouldn't have resulted in any warnings being given to Mr E. And I've also already said why I don't think Mr E would've reacted to the Scorpion insert, had it been sent to him, by changing his mind and not going ahead with the transfer.

So, while I understand Mr E has lost out financially by investing in high-risk investments, which were likely unsuitable for him, in the circumstances and for the reasons I have set out above, I don't think it is fair and reasonable for Aviva to put right those losses.

My final decision

For the reasons above, I've decided to not uphold this complaint, so I make no award in Mr E's favour.

Under the rules of the Financial Ombudsman Service, I'm required to ask Mr E to accept or reject my decision before 13 February 2025.

Paul Featherstone

Ombudsman