

Complaint

Mrs V has complained that Capital One Europe plc (“Capital One”) irresponsibly provided a credit card as well and subsequent credit limit increases to her.

She says that the credit card and limit increases were unaffordable and caused her continued financial difficulty as she struggled to make her payments, which affected her going forward.

Background

In January 2019, Capital One provided Mrs V with a credit card, which had a limit of £200. Capital One subsequently offered Mrs V a limit increase to £450 in June 2021.

In November 2025, Mrs V complained saying that the credit card and the limit increases Capital One provided were unaffordable and caused her continued financial difficulty as she struggled to make her payments which affected her going forward.

Capital One didn’t uphold Mrs V’s complaint as it believed that she had complained about the decision to provide the card. It didn’t think it did anything wrong when increasing Mrs V’s credit limit in June 2021. Mrs V remained dissatisfied after Capital One’s response and referred her complaint to our service.

One of our investigators reviewed what Mrs V and Capital One had told us. She thought that she hadn’t seen enough to be persuaded that Capital One failed to act fairly and reasonably either when initially providing Mrs V with her credit card, or the credit limit increase. This meant that the investigator didn’t recommend that Mrs V’s complaint be upheld.

Mrs V disagreed with the investigator’s conclusions and asked for an ombudsman to look at her complaint.

My findings

I’ve considered all the available evidence and arguments to decide what’s fair and reasonable in the circumstances of this complaint.

Basis for my consideration of this complaint

There are time limits for referring a complaint to the Financial Ombudsman Service. Capital One has argued that Mrs V’s complaint was made too late because she complained more than six years after the decision to provide the credit card; as well as more than three years after she ought reasonably to have been aware of her cause to make this complaint.

Our investigator explained why it was reasonable to interpret the complaint as being one alleging that the relationship between her and Capital One was unfair to her as described in s140A of the Consumer Credit Act 1974 (“CCA”). She also explained why this complaint about an allegedly unfair lending relationship had been made in time.

Having carefully considered everything, I've decided not to uphold Mrs V's complaint. Given the reasons for this, I'm satisfied that whether Mrs V's complaint about the specific lending decisions was made in time or not has no impact on that outcome.

I'm also in agreement with the investigator that Mrs V's complaint should be considered more broadly than just those lending decisions. I consider this to be the case as Mrs V has not only complained about the respective decisions to lend but has also alleged that the repayments unfairly caused her continued financial difficulty as she struggled to make her payments which affected her going forward.

I'm therefore satisfied that Mrs V's complaint can therefore reasonably be interpreted as a complaint about the fairness of her relationship with Capital One. I acknowledge Capital One still doesn't agree we can look at Mrs V's complaint, but given the outcome I have reached, I do not consider it necessary to make any further comment or reach any findings on these matters. This includes Mrs V's submissions on why she believes she complained in time.

In deciding what is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances of Mrs V's case, I am required to take relevant law into account. As, for the reasons I've explained above, I'm satisfied that Mrs V's complaint can be reasonably interpreted as being about the fairness of her relationship with Capital One, relevant law in this case includes s140A, s140B and s140C of the CCA.

S140A says that a court may make an order under s140B if it determines that the relationship between the creditor (Capital One) and the debtor (Mrs V), arising out of a credit agreement is unfair to the debtor because of one or more of the following, having regard to all matters it thinks relevant:

- any of the terms of the agreement;
- the way in which the creditor has exercised or enforced any of his rights under the agreement;
- any other thing done or not done by or on behalf of the creditor.

Case law shows that a court assesses whether a relationship is unfair at the date of the hearing, or if the credit relationship ended before then, at the date it ended. That assessment has to be performed having regard to the whole history of the relationship. S140B sets out the types of orders a court can make where a credit relationship is found to be unfair – these are wide powers, including reducing the amount owed or requiring a refund, or to do or not do any particular thing.

Given Mrs V's complaint, I therefore need to think about whether Capital One's decision to lend to Mrs V and increase her credit limits, or its later actions resulted in the lending relationship between Mrs V and Capital One being unfair to Mrs V, such that it ought to have acted to put right the unfairness – and if so whether it did enough to remove that unfairness.

Mrs V's relationship with Capital One is therefore likely to be unfair if it didn't carry out reasonable enquiries into Mrs V's ability to repay in circumstances where doing so would have revealed the credit card or limit increases to be irresponsible or unaffordable. And if this was the case, Capital One didn't then remove the unfairness this created somehow.

Were the decisions to provide the credit card and subsequent credit limit increase unfair?

We've explained how we handle complaints about unaffordable and irresponsible lending on our website. And I've used this approach to help me decide Mrs V's complaint.

I think that it would be helpful for me to set out that we consider what a firm did to check whether any repayments to credit were affordable (asking it to evidence what it did) and then determine whether this was enough for the lender to have made a reasonable decision on whether to lend.

Generally, we think it's reasonable for a lender's checks to be less thorough – in terms of how much information it gathers and what it does to verify that information – in the early stages of a lending relationship.

But we might think it needed to do more if, for example, a borrower's income was low, the amount lent was high, or the information the lender had – such as a significantly impaired credit history – suggested the lender needed to know more about a prospective borrower's ability to repay.

That said, I think that it is important for me to explain that our website does not provide a set list of mandated checks that a lender is expected to carry out on every occasion. Indeed, the requirements have not and still do not mandate a list of checks that a lender should use. Any rules, guidance and good industry practice in place over the years has simply set out the types of things that a lender could do when considering whether to lend to a prospective borrower.

It is for a lender to decide which checks it wishes to carry out, although we can form a view on whether we think what was done was fair to the extent it allowed the lender to reasonably understand whether the borrower could make their payments. Furthermore, if we don't think that the lender did enough to establish whether the repayments that a prospective borrower might have to make were affordable, this doesn't on its own mean that a complaint should be upheld.

We would usually only go on to uphold a complaint in circumstances where we were able to recreate what reasonable checks are likely to have shown – typically using information from the consumer – and this clearly shows that the repayments in question were unaffordable.

Capital One's decision to provide Mrs V with a credit card which had a credit limit of £200 in January 2019 and then increase her credit limit to £450 in June 2021

Capital One says it initially agreed to Mrs V's application after it obtained information on her income and carried out a credit search. And the information obtained indicated that Mrs V would be able to make the low monthly repayments due for this credit card. Due to Mrs V's account being relatively well managed and the information present on the credit checks it carried out, Mrs V was then subsequently offered her credit limit increases.

On the other hand, Mrs V says that the credit card and the subsequent limit increase were unaffordable and her struggle to make repayments caused ongoing difficulty.

I've considered what the parties have said.

What's important to note is that Mrs V was provided with a revolving credit facility rather than a loan. This means that to start with Capital One was required to understand whether Mrs V could repay £200 and then £450 within a reasonable period of time. It's fair to say that the required monthly payments in order to clear the full amount that could be owed, as a result of credit limits of £200 and £450, within a reasonable period of time are relatively low.

I've seen records of the information Capital One obtained from Mrs V about her income and what was on the credit search carried out. The credit search showed that Mrs V didn't have any significant adverse information - such as defaulted accounts or county court judgments recorded against her at either of these times.

The credit search also showed that Mrs V had a low amount of active credit at these respective stages. And these commitments were also being relatively well maintained. Capital One also says that Mrs V declared she had an annual income of £25,000.00 a year.

Capital One argues that the information that Mrs V declared on her income combined with the credit file information meant that it was reasonable to conclude that Mrs V could afford this credit card. Having reviewed the information obtained and bearing in mind the low monthly repayments required to clear balances of £200 and £450 within a reasonable period of time, I'm in agreement with this conclusion.

I'm also mindful that the regulatory rules permitted Capital One to place weight on its previous dealing with Mrs V and therefore her repayment record on the existing credit advanced as part of its checks. I think that this is important because while Mrs V did make the minimum payment due on her account on some occasions, when taken in the round her repayment record in the period between the card being given and Mrs V's limit being increased does was commensurate with repaying £450 within a reasonable period of time.

In these circumstances, Mrs V's repayment record does suggest that Capital One was reasonably entitled to believe that Mrs V could afford the limit increase. Given this is the case and the fact that what Capital One saw suggested that what she owed elsewhere wasn't drastically increasing, I'm not persuaded that it was unfair or unreasonable for Capital One to have offered the limit increase, to £450 in June 2021.

Furthermore, this isn't a case where I can reasonably say that the limit increase and Mrs V's account usage ought reasonably to have shown Capital One that Mrs V's indebtedness, on her credit card, was rapidly increasing in an uncontrollable way, or that the pattern of lending here ought reasonably to have led Capital One to conclude that the facility had become demonstrably unsustainable for Mrs V either. There was anything in any of the information obtained which suggested that Mrs V may have been struggling either.

So overall and having carefully considered everything and while I appreciate that this will disappoint Mrs V, I've not been persuaded that proportionate checks would have shown Capital One that it shouldn't have provided Mrs V with her credit card or the limit increase. Furthermore, I don't think that Mrs V's pattern of borrowing meant that Capital One offered the credit limit increase in circumstances where it ought reasonably to have realised that they may have been unsustainable or otherwise harmful for her either.

Overall, and based on the available evidence I don't find that Mrs V's relationship with Capital One was unfair. I've not been persuaded that Capital One created unfairness in its relationship with Mrs V by irresponsibly lending to her whether when initially agreeing to provide her with a credit card, or in respect of the limit increase. I don't find Capital One treated Mrs V unfairly in any other way either based on what I've seen.

So overall and having considered everything, while I can understand Mrs V's sentiments and sympathise with any difficulty she's had repaying this credit card, I'm nonetheless not upholding this complaint. I appreciate this will be very disappointing for Mrs V. But I hope she'll understand the reasons for my decision and that she'll at least feel her concerns have been listened to.

My final decision

For the reasons I've explained, I'm not upholding Mrs V's complaint.

Under the rules of the Financial Ombudsman Service, I'm required to ask Mrs V to accept or reject my decision before 5 May 2026.
