

complaint

This complaint is about a credit card payment protection insurance (“PPI”) policy taken out in May 2008. Mrs S says Tesco Personal Finance PLC mis-sold her the policy.

background

The background and circumstances leading up to this complaint, which includes Mrs S’s circumstances at the time of the sale as well as the PPI policy benefits, limitations and exclusions of cover, aren’t disputed. So I haven’t repeated all of this information here.

Our adjudicator did not uphold the mis-sale complaint, but they thought Tesco’s offer to pay back some of the cost of the PPI because of the non-disclosure of high commission and profit share Mrs S paid, was fair in the circumstances.

Mrs S’s representative disagreed with the adjudicator’s opinion – they didn’t raise any new or additional points but repeated the same complaint points and arguments they’d previously made.

As the complaint couldn’t be resolved informally, it has been passed to me for a final decision.

my findings

Although I have only included a summary of the complaint, I have read and considered all the evidence and arguments available to me from the outset, in order to decide what is, in my opinion, fair and reasonable in all the circumstances of this complaint.

When considering what is fair and reasonable, I am required to take into account relevant: law and regulations; regulators’ rules, guidance and standards; codes of practice; and, where appropriate, what I consider to have been good industry practice at the time.

We’ve set out our general approach to PPI mis-sale complaints on our website and published some example final decisions that set out in detail how these relevant considerations may apply to PPI sales like Mrs S’s. I haven’t set out that detailed information here but I’ve taken into account all relevant considerations in deciding Mrs S’s complaint.

Having done so, I’ve decided not to uphold the mis-sale complaint. I’ve also considered the issue of non-disclosure of commission. And I’ve decided Tesco should have disclosed the commission it received - but that Tesco’s offer to refund some of the cost of PPI to compensate for the unfairness caused is fair in the circumstances. I’ve summarised my reasons for each of these conclusions below.

In summary, my reasons for not upholding the mis-sale part of this complaint are:

- I think Tesco made it clear that Mrs S didn’t have to take out the PPI and she chose to take it out. I say this because when she applied for her card online, she was given the option of choosing whether or not she wanted to take PPI, by way of selecting either a ‘yes’ or a ‘no’ option as part of her online application. She was also then sent a credit agreement to sign online and again had the opportunity at that point to confirm whether or not she wanted PPI cover – and this was something she could separately to confirming she wanted the card.

- Tesco didn't recommend the PPI to Mrs S – I think that's shown by the fact that Mrs S bought the PPI when applying for the card online. That means Tesco it didn't have to check that the PPI was right or suitable for her. But it did have to give Mrs S enough clear and timely information so she could decide for herself if it was right for her.
- It's possible the information Tesco gave Mrs S about the PPI wasn't as clear as it should've been. But I've found that she chose to take it out - so it looks like she wanted this type of cover. The cover wasn't fundamentally wrong for Mrs S. Although Mrs S has told us about having treatment for a condition over a number of years, this took place several years before she took out the PPI and doesn't appear to have had an adverse impact on her general health. And the other conditions she told us about appear to have been one-off instances that didn't lead to her taking significant amounts of time off work. So I don't think better information about the policy's medical exclusions would've caused her to change her mind about taking out the policy. For this particular policy there were also no additional restrictions on cover for mental health or back problems. It also looks like it was affordable – so it seems like it would have been useful for her if something went wrong. Because of this I don't think Mrs S would have declined the cover had Tesco done anything more.

Overall, I consider that Mrs S would have still taken out PPI. The policy was sufficiently close to what it's likely she thought she was getting, and I think the policy could provide a useful benefit in a difficult time, given her circumstances at the time. And in those circumstances, I think that she would have taken out the policy in any event.

Mrs S's representative has raised a number of what I consider to be general complaint points, which it says apply to all PPI complaints. These general points include: a claim that the Financial Ombudsman Service is not correctly applying the regulator's rules and guidance for handling PPI complaints; these policies represented poor value because of the number of significant exclusions and limitations of cover coupled with the low claims ratio; and the duty of utmost good faith meant Tesco should have disclosed the poor value and explained the significance of the limitations and exclusions and the impact it had on the chances of making a claim.

But Mrs S's representative has not said how these points apply to the specific facts and circumstances of Mrs S's individual complaint – just that they apply to all PPI complaints.

I have thought about these things and how they might apply in Mrs S's particular case. But these points don't persuade me to alter my conclusions about what is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances of the complaint – for the reasons I've set out above I don't uphold the mis-sale element of this complaint.

This means Tesco doesn't have to pay back all of the cost of the PPI to Mrs S.

non-disclosure of commission

As I said above, I've also considered the issue of non-disclosure of commission, including whether the non-disclosure resulted in an unfair relationship under section 140A of the Consumer Credit Act – and if so, what fair compensation would be to remedy that unfairness.

Having done so I've decided Tesco should have disclosed the commission it received and that Tesco's offer to refund some of the cost of PPI to compensate for the unfairness caused is fair. My reasons are set out below.

was there an unfair relationship?

Tesco didn't tell Mrs S about the high levels of commission and profit share paid resulting from the PPI sale. So taking into account:

- The Supreme Court judgment in *Plevin*¹ and the conclusion in that case that the non-disclosure of commission could lead to an unfair relationship;
- The FCA's rules and guidance for handling complaints about the non-disclosure of commission and profit share - introduced in light of the Supreme Court judgment in Plevin - which requires a business to presume that the failure to disclose commission gave rise to an unfair relationship where the business expected commission and profit share to be more than 50% of the cost of the policy; and
- the likelihood, in my view, that a court would determine that the relationship between Tesco and Mrs S was unfair under section 140A of the Consumer Credit Act because Tesco didn't tell her about the high levels of commission and profit share in this case

I don't think Tesco acted fairly and reasonably in its dealings with Mrs S because it failed to disclose the high commission and profit share.

redress to remedy that unfair relationship

I'm now required to consider what is fair compensation in all the circumstances to remedy the unfairness I have identified.

Mrs S's representative has made a number of representations about this part of the complaint including the impact of the Plevin judgment and sections 140A and 140B of the Consumer Credit Act on her complaint.

In summary they have said Mrs S should get back all the money she paid for the policy because: Tesco failed to tell Mrs S about the high commission and profit-share rates paid, the low claims ratio and the restrictions and exclusions on cover. Because they say that meant the policy was poor value, I should find that Mrs S wouldn't have taken out the policy had they known about the level of commission and she should receive a refund of all the premiums she paid.

But I don't agree. I'm mindful of the following:

- The Supreme Court judgment in Plevin made no specific finding about whether the consumer in that case would or would not have bought the PPI policy had the commission been disclosed;
- A court would have a range of powers available under section 140 B to remedy the

¹ Plevin v Paragon Personal Finance Limited [2014] UKSC 61 in which the Supreme Court concluded that the non-disclosure of commission could lead to an unfair relationship

unfairness caused by the non-disclosure of commission – it does not follow that a court would automatically order a return of all the premiums paid or conclude that a consumer would not have purchased the policy had the commission been disclosed; and

- The FCA considered the matter and decided that it wouldn't be appropriate to merge the considerations about undisclosed commission in the existing rules and guidance about mis-selling (hence the two-step approach for firms handling PPI complaints) and that the impact of any undisclosed commission and any remedy caused by it should be considered at step 2.

Taking into account relevant law and the FCA's rules and guidance, my role as an ombudsman is to determine what redress, if any, would represent fair compensation for Mrs S in order to remedy the unfairness caused by Tesco not disclosing the high level of commission to her before she purchased the policy.

So, taking into account:

- The FCA's guidance usually requires a business to refund the amounts paid by the consumer in commission and profit share above 50% of the policy's cost, plus interest in order to remedy the unfairness caused by the failure to disclose the level of commission;
- refunding some of the money paid for the PPI policy in this way is an order which, in my view a court could, in the exercise of its discretion, make under section 140B of the Consumer Credit Act in order to remedy any unfairness; and
- I am not, as Mrs S's representative suggests, driven to conclude that she wouldn't have purchased the policy but for Tesco's failure to disclose the level of commission for the reasons I've given above.

I think it was fair for Tesco to calculate compensation in line with the FCA's guidance and return some of the money Mrs S paid for her PPI policy.

I consider this fairly removes the source of the unfairness. This is because it leaves Mrs S with the policy I've concluded above she would still have taken out if Tesco had done everything it should have done – but with lower commission and profit share levels.

So I consider that Tesco's offer of payment of an amount equivalent to the commission and profit share paid in excess of 50% of the policy costs (plus associated interest where applicable) in line with the FCA's guidance to firms is fair in all the circumstances.

my final decision

Overall, having considered all the evidence and arguments to decide what is, in my opinion, fair and reasonable in all the circumstances of this complaint and for the reasons I have set out above, I don't uphold the mis-sale element of Mrs S's complaint or make any award in favour of her for this part of the complaint.

But because of the non-disclosure of commission and profit share, I've decided that Tesco Personal Finance PLC should pay Mrs S an amount equivalent to the commission and profit share paid in excess of 50% of the policy cost (plus associated interest where applicable), if it hasn't already done so.

Under the rules of the Financial Ombudsman Service, I'm required to ask Mrs S to accept or reject my decision before 3 October 2021.

Michael Goldberg
ombudsman